Industrial process air systems that process solids, liquids, or gases often find themselves in a position where they experience a discharge of air that contains a material that is not desirable for their process. It is desirable, for example, to be able to remove from air that contains hydrocarbon contaminant that is a by-product of the production of pulp or paper products. In the case of hydrocarbon by-products, in particular diesel particulates, there has been recent progress in the development of filter media that can remove the components of diesel particulate. However, until recently filter media that was appropriate for the removal of diesel particulate from industrial process air have been unable to remove significant levels of other contaminants, such as gaseous hydrocarbons. Filter media that was made from fibrous filter tow has been proposed for filtering of gaseous hydrocarbons, but their low filter efficiency has limited their effectiveness in filtering of gaseous hydrocar 570a42141b
