Mutations of the p53 tumor suppressor gene occur in approximately 50% of human cancers. Analysis of the p53 gene in high-risk adenomas and colorectal cancer has revealed that most mutations are found in early stage tumors. In this study, we used single-strand conformation polymorphism analysis of polymerase chain reaction-amplified DNA fragments to screen 170 colon and 76 rectal adenomas from 45 patients for p53 gene mutations. Mutations of the p53 gene were found in eight colorectal adenomas, including two mutations observed in two morphologically identical adenomas. Polymerase chain reaction-single-strand conformation polymorphism analysis of the entire coding region of the p53 gene revealed that seven of the mutations were in the "hot spot" region and three in the trans-activation domain. All mutations were G:C to A:T transitions at CpG dinucleotide sites. These mutations are commonly observed in both hereditary and sporadic colon cancers but have not been described previously in adenomas. The mutation rate was 5.3%. Five mutations were also found in four colorectal carcinomas which had been obtained at autopsy. One mutation was detected in a mucosal adenoma of an area adjacent to the carcinoma. In conclusion, p53 gene mutations occur early in the adenoma-carcin
