A recent study showed that 21 percent of college students believe they are at greater risk for their future identity being stolen than they are for being injured while driving. In part, this is due to the fact that many students don't understand how to lock their cars and many of the cars they own have remote keyless entry systems which can be accessed from the outside. A new report shows that consumers are taking their consumer rights and their security more seriously than ever. 60 percent of consumers report engaging in a form of online revenge after suffering a security breach, leaving the door wide open for potential hackers. "After the Department of Homeland Security's 2009 research highlighted the importance of securing the U.S. consumer's credit information, Americans are now turning that sentiment into action," said Greg Griffith, senior vice president, Consumer Default Service, Cox Automotive. "This report shows that consumers are firmly taking control of their financial lives by recognizing the importance of protecting their personal information and working together with Cox so that they'll know when an information breach takes place and can take immediate action."
