Visit: www.fotoxplorer.comDetection of c-Fos expression in relation to peripheral nicotinic acetylcholine receptor sites: an immunohistochemical study of rat cerebral cortex. It is generally accepted that nicotine activates nicotinic acetylcholine receptors (nAChRs) to mediate the effects of nicotine, and previous immunohistochemical studies have demonstrated c-Fos expression in rat cerebral cortex in response to direct injections of nicotine into the brain. The present study was designed to correlate c-Fos expression in cortical neurons with the distributions of nAChRs in adult rats. Using immunohistochemistry and the nicotinic receptor-specific monoclonal antibody alpha-bungarotoxin, we compared the distribution of c-Fos expression in cerebral cortex following intraperitoneal administration of nicotine (0.5 mg/kg) with the distribution of nicotinic acetylcholine receptor subunits alpha3, alpha4, alpha7, and beta2. Injection of nicotine increased the number of c-Fos-immunoreactive neurons in the deep layers (VI and V) of the cingulate, motor and somatosensory cortices by 2-4-fold over saline controls, with the increase occurring as early as 5 min post-injection. The increases in c-Fos-immunoreactivity in the deep cortical layers were localized specifically within the nAChR-immunoreactive neurons. Immunoreactivity for nAChR subunits alpha3, alpha4, alpha7 and beta2 were detected in layers II/III, IV, VI and V of the cingulate, motor and somatosensory cortices, and several subpopulations of nAChR-immunoreactive neurons were found in these layers. The immunoreactivity for all 4 nAChR subunits was not co-localized with c-Fos immunoreactivity and the subunit-specific antibodies also produced immunoreactivity in layer I. However, all 4 subunits were not co-localized in the nAChR
