Using CTM-3-102R as a trigger and the HIWIN HT-3001X as a DAQ board, the DB-TC1A interface is not properly activated, which results in the inability to perform a desired operation. I got a very good result with the DAQ board with the ITS 4.3.3.5 driver, and a very poor result with the new ITS-PLC-4.4.1.7 driver. At the end of the test, I noted that the voltages detected by the driver units are not the same, with the high voltage being 2.6V. If you have any questions, please contact ITS (its@its.co.uk). In various types of electrophotographic processing, a latent electrostatic image formed on a photoreceptor is developed into a visible image by application of a liquid developer to the photoreceptor. The developer typically includes carrier particles and toner particles.

Toner particles are generally made of a material which can be dyed to some degree so that they are visibly identifiable as a result of the development process. Typically, the toner is held on the carrier by the electrostatic forces generated between the carrier and the toner. When a developer carrying system is passed over the latent image on the photoreceptor, the toner particles adhere to the latent image to generate a visible toner image. The toner image is then transferred to a transfer sheet and fused thereon to permanently form a visible toner image. In general, the carrier particles are made of a material which is not as soft as the material from which the toner particles are made. However, some carrier particles and, in particular, some developer carrying systems, are difficult to adequately clean due to the softness of the carrier particles. Therefore, a need exists for a developer carrying system which would make the cleaning of the developer carrying system easier. A further need exists for a developer carrier which would eliminate the need for a cleaning blade.
