App does not change the desktop wallpaper automatically Download the app from the Microsoft Store It's not very often that we end up disappointed with a product launch, which is why we're so pleased about this one. We just downloaded the Windows 10 "March 2018 Update," and it's a completely different animal from what we've been used to in the past. And we're not just saying this because Microsoft has finally shed its surname. This is the first time we've encountered this fresh take on Windows, and we have some legitimate concerns, the biggest one being "what's missing?" Gone is the Start button. On mobile, Android and iOS, it is present on the bottom of the screen. However, on Windows, it is now found in the top-left corner, and in the middle of the start screen. That actually feels quite natural, and we like it. The side-mounted Start button has been replaced by a Search button that has also been extended to the top-right corner. Of course, you can still press this button to open the Start menu directly. But this button does not bring up the app list, just a search bar, as it does on mobile. This is not the only change: The menu items you can access via buttons on the right side are different. And the main page when you open the start menu is also completely different, but in a good way. Microsoft introduced this layout to make the start screen more legible, and we think it's a welcome addition. There's nothing wrong with the classic start screen as it is, and we like that. The side-mounted Start button also made a huge difference to us: There are fewer menu choices in the Start menu, so we don't have to scroll as much when we open it. This is a big problem, because Windows 10 is not a tablet operating system, and we have used it almost exclusively as a laptop. But aside from that change, the new Windows feels the same as in previous versions. It uses the same version of the .NET framework, a version we are very familiar with, and it has the same Microsoft Edge, a browser that is slow and clunky. The Start screen also
