The present invention relates generally to the field of electronic information retrieval and, more specifically, to techniques for extracting synonym information from documents. A Web search engine is an Internet-based application that allows users to search the Internet for documents, such as, for example, web pages and images. A typical Web search engine accepts keywords as input and generates a web page listing links to web pages that contain those keywords. A portion of such a web page can also be used to allow a user to submit a new keyword query for which it is desired to generate a new web page listing links to web pages that contain those keywords. A search engine typically uses a "spider" that crawls through a given collection of web pages and visits each page. The spider can index and store information about the web page, such as the title and the content of the web page. As the spider crawls, it follows links on the visited pages and records information about the web pages it visits. In this manner, the spider builds a database of information that it indexes. A search engine normally uses the indexed information to generate a list of links to the relevant web pages. These links can be generated in a variety of ways. One common method includes visiting a web page and returning to the search engine a text extract of that web page that includes one or more keywords. The keywords are typically provided by the user in a query, which can be a single keyword provided by a user or a phrase-based search provided by a user. Further, the index allows a user to find other, related web pages to the one the user is viewing. In order to find the related web pages, the search engine provides a list of the web pages that it finds to be relevant to the one the user is viewing. Each of the related web pages is usually visited by the spider. When a spider visits a web page, it typically records information, including the title of the visited web page. The recorded information is stored in an index and, in some cases, is stored as metadata that accompanies the link. A search engine can typically provide various types of information about the web pages in its database. It can provide basic text and HTML extractions. The search engine can also generate a summary of the content, and can perform various other types of operations on the web pages in the database. For example, the search engine can also be used to find other related web pages. Dictionaries Dictionaries are typically used to provide the text

Accordingly, the district court properly granted Humana's motion for summary judgment on this claim. D Hallquist argues that the district court abused its discretion in denying her motion to reopen discovery. In that motion, Hallquist sought to "reopen discovery to allow her the opportunity to obtain the kind of discovery she would have received had she not been lead counsel in this case." She claimed that she could obtain evidence, including documents relating to the deadline for filing charges with the EEOC, the existence of any requests to have the EEOC charge dismissed, and any documents or statements concerning her hostile work environment. The district court denied the motion. [7] We review the district court's ruling on discovery rulings for abuse of discretion. *FindWhat Info. Grp. Corp. v.
