A zymuth hard disc is a polarimeter.[1] A zymuth is measured using a cryogenically cooled sample cell, a phase-modulated light source, and a detector system: the goal is to detect the material's specific zymuth angle relative to the surface of the cell, which corresponds to a particular angle of incidence of light on the sample. A zymuth test requires the use of a zymuth polarimeter, which is a system for measuring the angle of reflection (or transmission) of a polarizing beam of light, utilizing birefringent crystals in which the refractive index varies with the orientation of the material with respect to the electric field of the beam.[1] A zymuth is measured using a cryogenically cooled sample cell, a phase-modulated light source, and a detector system:[2][3] The goal is to detect the material's specific zymuth angle relative to the surface of the cell, which corresponds to a particular angle of incidence of light on the sample.
