The aim of the present study was to assess the patients' and dentists' initial quality of life (QoL) and quality of dental therapy treatment before and after the use of a pre-prosthetic and prosthetic set up. The study examined a total of 81 patients and 13 dentists who were included at the Department of Prosthodontics of the School of Dentistry, Kufstein University. Patients' and dentists' initial quality of life (QoL) were determined using the Oral Health Impact Profile (OHIP), an abbreviated version of the International Classification of Impairments, Disabilities, and Handicaps (ICIDH), in connection with the questionnaire of the Austrian Health Questionnaire (AQ30). The dental therapy treatment quality was assessed with the SoTwelwe Questionnaire (SQ). Both measures were completed before and after the final prosthetic fit of conventional dentures. Changes in the quality of life after the use of the pre-prosthetic and prosthetic set up were assessed using the logistic regression analysis with OHIP and AQ30 data. The areas of interest were 'oral health', 'psychological well-being' and 'social well-being'. The results showed an increase in the quality of life. It was statistically significant for OHIP-14 scores before and after the final prosthetic fit of conventional dentures and also for AQ30 mental health dimension scores. The improvement of the mental health dimension was highly significant for patients and dentists. In the majority of patients, the dentist assessed their satisfaction positively. There was a positive relation between improvements in the quality of life and satisfaction with the treatment progress.
