DALLAS, TX—Employing an uncharacteristic display of confidence, local supermarket employee and University of Texas student Austin Deighton told reporters Thursday that he's been speaking to half the girls in the country about his desire to date them. "Lots of girls know I'm single, so I've been speaking to several of them. I know it's still early, but I'm feeling pretty optimistic about my chances," said Deighton, who explained that he believed he stood a better chance of dating one of the many attractive girls in the country than he did of hooking up with any of the acquaintances and acquaintances of acquaintances whom he passes in the grocery store every day. "I just need to make sure I'm being cool and non-creepy when I approach the girls. I think if I'm being sincere, they'll trust me and I'll have a lot more success than that guy who came in the store a few weeks ago was able to." At press time, Deighton was spotted failing to stand out among the dozens of women whose social media posts he recognized.

Advertisement Notes for Class on Friday - standardstartup One of my friends who introduced me to the startup scene gave me a copy of "Notes for Class on Friday" and suggested that this would be helpful to others. As background: I'm a full-stack engineer with no CS education, but have been doing startups full time for nearly two years. I've made a couple decent attempts at starting up, and I have a friend (who has a CS degree) that wants to start a company, and I figured I might give it a shot. I'm obviously not very good at sales/marketing, but I'm sure I could figure it out. So, how can I best get an idea of how to start a company? I've heard that you need a few people
