Or is the danger in all this just that we cannot move forward? Am I alone when I say I do not care for the word "fatigue"? Perhaps it is the fat? Fatigue has lost its resonance in the twentieth century, and the new age is the Age of Fitness. Fatigue is a dead issue. Fatigue is a concept that belongs in the world of alcoholics, people suffering from various kinds of mental illness. The real world is the world of vigor, the world of the young and the active. Fatigue is for the old, the sick, or the less able. There are physiological reasons for it. We use it to identify ourselves with the downtrodden. I feel all this is wrong. If I had the task of inventing a word to describe the condition of people in the modern, affluent society, I would invent a word like "unavailable", a word to describe a person who is busy taking care of other people, and who cannot meet a person such as yourself because someone else is sick, or he or she is in a meeting, or he or she is overseas. And if you decide that you do not care whether I have a choice of words, you can use other words to describe your choice not to meet with me. Fatigue is, of course, a symptom of the world I live in. There is a kind of fatigue that comes from a society in which almost everything happens too fast. But there is also a fatigue of fatigue. It is the reason why the double-decker bus did not make it to your town, and why the local grocer's sticker is now empty in your neighbourhood. It is the reason why our parks are shrinking and why child-minding is not a major source of employment. It is also why there is, in this moment, so much potential, and so little execution. Once, I gave a lecture in which I talked about optimism
