The best stories from the web, and the best featured article of the week is below. Uyghur translators raise alarm over labor abuses and mistreatment in Chinese factories 'The video footage I shot first led to life-saving surgery for my family.' By Rajan Menon Chinese-made clothes were second only to Chinese-made smartphones in the list of global brands in Apple's latest stock haul, worth $11 billion. In the US, they're less than a tenth of 1 percent of all retail clothing sales, according to market research firm NPD. And that's why the Chinese government, which controls 80 percent of the industry, has such leverage over industry practices. "If Apple didn't want to pay bribes, the government would not have allowed them to go into production," declared one activist from the All-China Federation of Trade Unions (ACFTU), the country's largest labor-union. "If an industry cannot get sufficient labor to supply its production, it is controlled by the government." At home, the cases of labor rights abuses have also attracted more attention from the public, and there have even been allegations of child labor, in defiance of a nine-year crackdown by the government on such practices. It's a problem that has been receiving increased attention since Apple shifted production of many of its components to the Chinese mainland in the mid-2010s. "A lot of the labor problems found in China that Apple was getting upset about actually were problems that China was already well aware
