I am talking about: class(struct) Client: public QObject { /* the same thing as QObject */ } that works as myClient = new Client; But If I want something like: myClient.fun1() myClient.fun2() myClient.fun3() myClient.fun4() ... ... How to do that? That is unreasonable of course, but is there a way to make it reasonably done? I would never think of returning a new stateful class because I could just return a pointer of the derived class, but this would be fine for what I want: class(struct) Client: public QObject { void fun1(); void fun2(); void fun3(); void fun4(); } // client class myClient = new Client; myClient.fun1(); myClient.fun2(); myClient.fun3(); myClient.fun4(); ... ... I guess there is no proper way to do that. Any ideas? I guess the way I do it is ok for small classes, but, if the structure of Client is already very complex, can't I group or inherit something like that? In this example, Client is just a sample and I know that I can't do that
