Q: Filter and paginate in Rails 3 I have a very large set of records that I need to display on a web page. The first page will show approximately 1,000 records, the second page will show another 1,000 records and so on. I'm using the standard methods for filtering my records in my controller, and getting the right number of records in my views. The problem is, I need to paginate the records so the user doesn't have to scroll through them. I'm using the Kaminari gem. I'm pretty sure I'm doing this right, but I am not seeing the records I want. Here's my code: def index @request_types = RequestType.all.where(:is_active => true) @data = @request_types.order("id DESC").page(params[:page]).per(10) end I am then rendering this in my view like this: 'request_types/request_type', :locals => {:value => value} %> The partial that's being rendered is the index of my request_types controller. Is this the correct way to go about this? I'm still fairly new to Rails and would appreciate any suggestions. A: This should be working. What method of pagination are you using? kaminari and any gems should make pagination easy. 'request_types/request_type', :locals => {:value => value} %> If you need to render records from a different controller then, in the index method of that controller you can render a different partial. If you have a common partial which is shared by several controllers then you can just include the partial like this, 'shared/request_type_for_all_controllers' %> and in the partial, you can refer to the controller by calling @controller.
