The new season of Veep just added another big name to its long list of political satirists, and another one who’s no stranger to the show. Former White House speechwriter David S. Pecker has joined the cast of the Emmy-winning comedy as its vice president of comedy, replacing Scott Caan, who stepped down in August after the second season. “I just love the idea that they hired me to make real-life people into cartoons,” said Pecker, a longtime fan of the show, in a statement. “The level of [artistic] quality here is the highest I have ever experienced.” He will appear in 10 episodes. Sometime between the third and fourth seasons, Pecker will leave the series, as he is also expected to take on a VP role at Fox, and has a television development deal with WME. (Talks are in the early stages, according to a source.) “It’s not a full-time job, but they’re being really kind to me,” Pecker said of his Fox role. Veep showrunners David Mandel and Armando Iannucci, who also serves as the series’ executive producer, had been looking for a replacement since Caan’s departure, and had been in talks with a number of the show’s long-time staffers to explore the possibility of hiring one. “We’ve been talking for a long time,” Iannucci said. “David [Pecker] is the best speechwriter in America, and so he is the ideal, perfect person to come and craft the speeches. At the same time, this is a comedy show, and he’s the perfect person to bring humor to that, and that’s something that he’s amazing at.” News of the hire was first reported by Variety. Pecker will be replacing Caan — who served as a consultant on the show for several episodes in the second season. TVLine first reported in August that the producers were looking for a new vice president of comedy. To search for that person, the writers had curated a list of potential replacements, including some who aren’t speaking actors, at the time. “I think it’s a testament to the vision of the show, it’s a show
