Many people have been complaining about 'shutdown' errors, including me. It seems that this has been on going for a couple of months now. Not sure if there's any certainty to this but I'm going to mention some reasons why this may have happened and some suggestions on how to fix it. Shorten your shutdown times There are a few tricks and tips that you can try to speed up your shutdown times, but before we get into that I want to explain to you the process that my computer goes through when it shuts down. First a few stats, The average time to shut down my computer has increased from around 15-20 seconds to around 30-35 seconds in the last couple of months, which I'm sure you can imagine that's a huge difference! This is what my shutdown times look like now, Example of shutdown times Although you can improve the amount of time taken to shutdown your system but I want to suggest another idea first which may be even easier than improving your shutdown times. Disabling the hibernation mode In order to get your system to shutdown quickly you need to first disable the hibernation mode. Go to Windows's power management options and then choose your power settings, then under Energy Settings, choose Change advanced power settings,
