Designer Evenson Sauers uses virtual reality to help his clients achieve the best look for any project. In his view, there’s no excuse not to create a prototype before making costly products. “When we’re talking about product design,” he said, “it’s paramount to be able to create and validate a proof of concept, which allows you to save time and money in the long run. It’s how we create the minimum viable product.” Knowing how an object moves can’t fully simulate how we interact with it, but it can help predict the best way to make something function. Making our own tools This is only a small start to what the web is offering up for desktop VR. As more information is shared online, augmented or virtual reality will be an easier, cheaper, more accessible way to interact with the world. A lot of the excitement has come from the open source community – developers working to get open hardware and open software to the masses. In 2015, a man called Adam Wilson started building a virtual design assistant for free on the web called Mycroft Mark I. Mycroft Mark I is a prototype for a virtual assistant, an app that will learn from data on your computer, and eventually be able to finish tasks for you. Mark II is already there, and you can download it
