The major objectives of this proposal are to understand how phosphorylation of proteins by cdc2 controls the cell cycle. In particular, the goal of this work is to understand how phosphorylation of two different cell cycle proteins correlates with cell cycle events. Phosphorylation of cdc2 by kinases will be used as an assay for the cdc2 kinase activity and antibody to cdc2 will be used to measure the proportion of active cdc2 in any cell extract. Antibody and cdc2 phosphorylation will be used to study the functional relationships between cdc2 and other proteins as the cell cycle proceeds. Differences in level of phosphorylation will be studied with antibodies to a specific phosphopeptide and the level of cdc2 phosphorylation will be correlated with the level of phosphorylation of other cell cycle proteins. Antibodies will also be used to study the role of cdc2 in S phase entry and the regulation of cell cycle protein kinases.Q: Converting a bytea to an int in PostgreSQL How do I convert a bytea
