Typically, a small, unobtrusive, radio-frequency (RF)-powered transponder, called an RFID tag, is attached to the object or a product on which identification information is to be stored. An RFID reader is then used to read the identification information from the RFID tag. The term "reader" as used herein should be understood to include any device that reads the RFID tag and, in particular, any device that includes a means of transmitting and receiving electromagnetic waves for reading the RFID tag. For example, an RFID reader can be a mobile phone, a personal digital assistant, a computer, a personal computer, a street lamp, a traffic light, a parking meter, a door reader, or a beeper. An RFID reader can also be known as an "ID reader" or an "ID reader" or "RFID reader". RFID tags store no power, must be active only a fraction of a second to be read and can be read from a distance up to hundreds of meters. In addition, RFID tags offer security because they can only be read if the correct interrogation signal is sent to them, so an unauthorized person will 1cdb36666d
