Q: What happens to neutron star when it runs out of iron core? If the iron core (in the center of a neutron star) runs out, what happens to the neutron star? Does it collapse into a black hole? I hope it doesn't to be anymore. A: The core of a neutron star is a neutron degenerate fermion gas in beta equilibrium. Given the density and temperature, it looks like iron. When it runs out, there will be no more electrons, and the number of protons will balance. The result is a neutron star where the core is completely neutronized. Since neutron degeneracy pressure will still hold it all in its center, the star doesn't collapse. It only gets smaller. Stars larger than about a few solar masses will not be subject to gravitational collapse. See this, for example. Note that the core itself is only about 0.1 times the star radius. The core is probably the densest thing in the star, but this only matters in the outer core, where neutrons are the main component. The core where protons are the main component is very small compared to the total mass of the star. Q: Spark crashes whenever I try to run my program Spark is crashing whenever I try to run a simple program I made in spark. #i am using pycharm #if using this code, python_install_path is your anaconda python #if you want to use it in linux you have to run 'export PYTHON_DIR=/usr/local/opt/anaconda/libexec/python3.5' first from pyspark import SparkConf, SparkContext conf = SparkConf() sc = SparkContext(appName="SparkExample", config=conf) sc.textFile("input.txt").collect() When I run the above code, I got this error: ERROR
