polytope but not a polyhedron. Affine gaskets are a special case of isogonal sets.

Definition A set A in n -dimensional Euclidean space is an affine gasket if it is compact and convex, but not a polytope (this means that the intersection of any two linearly independent affine hyperplanes which do not contain the origin contains only the origin). Every affine gasket can be obtained by placing the origin, $n + 1$ points, with integer coordinates, in general position in n -dimensional Euclidean space. The convex hull of these points is an affine gasket. The gasket A is called special if it is also a segment. This definition is equivalent to requiring that the origin is in the relative interior of one of the facets. Note that the term "affine gasket" is a synonym for the term "isogonal polytope", although the latter term is used more frequently.

Properties Affine gaskets have empty interior and are closed in the Hausdorff metric. Affine gaskets do not necessarily have non-empty interior in the affine sense. Affine gaskets can be considered a polytopal subdivision of the n-dimensional Euclidean space.

Affine gaskets are not necessarily regular. An affine gasket A can be written as $A = [P_1, \dots, P_k, E]$, where the polytopes P_1, \dots, P_k are n-dimensional, all lie in A (i.e. they are faces of A), and E is the n-dimensional Euclidean space. Affine gaskets are self-affine. The set of hyperplanes through the origin which do not intersect an affine gasket is a self-affine set.

Examples Any closed segment in R^n can be considered an affine gasket of R^n . Such gaskets are called

"affine open lines".
