The licensed client account can read logs for the account which is stored on a server. The system logs can be read from the server by clients who use the Syslog Service application. The version of the server software for which the client is purchased can be used in combination with any other version of the Syslog Server. The client logs are written in the log file format. The file format is used on the client to read the logs. In the configuration file, we have a directory named '/var/log/machine' that should be specified as a path to the log files. The configuration file is supplied with the same file format as the client logs Configure logs On configured machines, the Configuration /etc/logind.conf file contains a list of logs. The logs are configured in a format similar to the client logs. For example, in the configure logs file, we set the following: var/log/machine ${LOG_FILE_LEN} file

`/var/log/machine location /var/log/machine { index ${LOG_FILE_LEN} ${FILE_NAME}} } index ${LOG_FILE_LEN} ${FILE_NAME}` The log files are located in the `./var/log/machine` subdirectories on the Debian server. Each log file takes about 1 to 4MB. If you see log messages with very large amounts of information, the file size may have increased. You can reduce the file size by deleting unnecessary entries or simply reducing the number of lines in the file you want to analyze. When working with a large number of files larger than 1 GB, it is recommended that you use the Analyze feature and, if possible, create larger files as often as possible. If you reduce the size of an existing file, the size of the created file will be larger. If you are trying to analyze a file with a very large amount of information, you may need to increase the size of the existing file. If the file is too large and you do not know how to reduce it, use the analysis features.
