The Platform for Internet Content Selection (PICS) was developed by the World Wide Web Consortium (W3C) to overcome the problems inherent in content-based systems for protecting children from Internet content that their parents consider objectionable. A label is a statement about the content of a document or Web site. PICS uses labels and user profiles to ensure that users are presented only with content that they are comfortable viewing (such as that no sexually explicit material is present). Content blocked by PICS typically displays a message stating that the content was blocked on the basis that it was not in compliance with PICS. PICS is an infrastructure for associating descriptions, called PICS labels, with documents and Web sites on the Internet. PICS can accommodate any labeling vocabulary: currently several vocabularies are in use that indicate either age-appropriateness or the presence of potentially objectionable content such as offensive language or nudity. A label is not normally visible when a document is displayed to a user; instead, when a PICS-compliant browser is used, the browser reads the PICS label and determines if the associated document meets the user's criteria for display. If a document fails to meet the user's criteria, it is blocked, unless the user chooses to override the block. As of December 1996, Microsoft Internet Explorer 3.0 is PICS compliant, as are a number of stand-alone filtering products.
