Major fossil fuels resources in the United States, including oil, coal, and natural gas, are steadily decreasing. A number of popular energy alternatives do exist, including wind and solar power. Renewable energy technologies like those have become more viable over the years and can help to decrease carbon emissions. Renewable energy has become increasingly valuable to state governments and developers have realized that the best way to control these costs is to sell rights to use land to individuals and companies. The changing of these rights can help to free up future development, increase tax revenue for the governments that own them, and even avoid filling up their governmental databases if the land remains untouched. The rest of the chapter is devoted to a deeper analysis of events that have shaped the political, economic, and legal landscape of international relations since the 1970s, the best known of which is probably the OPEC (Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries) international oil cartel. In 1973, the Organization of the Petroleum Exporting Countries (OPEC) was formed with 14 countries which included the United States and the Soviet Union as a method to regulate oil prices and to ensure fair trade practices. In the 1970s, these countries were experiencing a crisis due to increased competition from emerging economies and a worldwide rise in oil prices. In an attempt to control the price of oil, the Arab states formed OPEC in order to establish an overall price of the oil. Today, OPEC is the largest oil producing entity on Earth with 23 countries.
