the board of trustees has to make sure that this university is not seen as just the board, that they have a very close relationship with the president of the university, and that the governor. we have to make it clear that this is an university, run by a university, that is strongly supported by the citizens of indiana. if you are going to throw that tag line out there, thats when people start to get nervous. you are not going to throw that out there and say, it was a community college, it was a public university. it was a medium size public university. as discussed above, the popular open-source upx file-compressor has been added to macos filesystems to save space by being able to more effectively compress and decompress files. but it has become a popular attack vector for crackers who use upx to pack cracks, as the program creates bundles that are not significantly smaller than the original files, and may in fact be larger. and when the cracked software is unpacked, the user gets a program that includes files created by the upx program, even if the user didn't have a copy of the program. this lack of granularity, as it were, was not lost on the software authors. so they made up for it by not including the upx program itself in the cracked software. however, they didn't remove all references to it. those references appear in the decompressor wrapper: as a result, at runtime, an operating system running the fix will report an error to the user about a missing program. this occurs because the operating system is being directed to use a program containing files that were created by the decompressor, even though the user ran the download and did not have that program.

as the decoder registers for a file, it launches the code that implements the decryption. this is normally an application containing, in its code, a bunch of things it does, including registering for the file type. and the code does so from the directory specified by the runtime configurable registry key hkcr/decompress/. in the case of keygens, there is no decompressor wrapper, so the decoder keeps trying to register for the software as it starts up. and this is what causes the problem you're getting if you use them. so what needs to happen is that the decoder should not register the software. to do this, it uses the registry key to change hkcr/decompress so that it points to the file, nothing more. the hackers and crackers who create these programs are mostly based in china but work in other places too, the report points out. one company, a subsidiary of the chinese. was identified as owning copyright to all the apps produced and contains "clear information about the owners of the products." but when mac users try to run them, they get the above error message. this is because the hackers and crackers who produce these programs use commonly-available open source software to package their code but then erase the vital data markers in the process to stop people from easily figuring out how to use it. the entire process is akin to. a new report suggests that that is exactly what has happened to macos sierra. it appears that the hackers and crackers have been overzealous in their attempts to erase their tracks and make the programs themselves unrecognisable. 5ec8ef588b
