He was convinced that governments and nations are like plants that should be watered by the King. This has been his trend in the past too. In 1275, for instance, he urged Yasovarman II to unite all the people of the Indian Subcontinent with the help of the great teacher Gaudiya dasa. In 1296, he appealed to Rajendra Chola II to do the same. At the same time, he also made sincere efforts for the unification of all the people of South Asia, especially those living in the southern hemisphere. In 1303, he reached the conclusion that, unless there is a strong ksatriya, the glory and power of the Aryans will decline. Some of his kingly ideas were presented in his poem Tulsi Ramayana. Some poets of later times considered this poem as one of the three greatest poems in the world. In 1320, he emphasized the fact that the basest of men is still an object of compassion and respect. In 1328, he fought against Brahmins who were manipulating the society to promote their own interests. In 1357, he suggested the use of the self-written Guru Granth Sahib as a script for the epics of the Hindus. In 1371, he used Sanskrit, because it is the most lucid language in
