If you collect images from various sources, you may be interested in the new image search capabilities in Lightroom 5. A mosaic/basket image may work best for your needs. The new one-click Share functionality also makes sharing your images much easier. The Experience tab now shows the importance of cropping and sharpening images for your intended use, but don't worry - you can use a preset image style for that. Adobe has updated the Lightroom catalog view to make it more like Lightroom's equivalent of a database. That is, the view now shows only what's in the catalog and what's cataloged - you will no longer be shown folders with images. You will be able to search your images without having to peruse folders. If you want to open a particular folder, you can do so quickly and easily, too. You can also set your Lightroom to automatically organize images into catalogs on import. Adobe has added new ways to view your images in your albums. You can now quickly switch between the display of an assortment of views, including an image on the computer screen and a lightbox view. If you need to view all images in an album at once, you can now show them in a mosaic view rather than scrolling through all the images one by one. An individual image can now be shown a different way, too. Member collaboration is a bit stronger as well. If you've been collaborating with other Lightroom users, there are two types of projects you can create: a Things or a Documents project. The Things project includes all images in that project and are applicable to Lightroom's export options.
