D16 Repeater™ is a vintage modeled delay plugin created by D16 Audio Group Software in collaboration with Slate Digital. Vintage-Modeled Delay Plugin in a Single Unit. It has a dedicated ribbon housed on the unit for easy access of the built-in parameters. D16 Group Repeater VSTi 1.1.2. Mac OSXQ: SharedPreferences: How to store a small amount of data? We are just starting working on an Android project and we need some data shared between multiple activities of a single application. What are the best practices about the use of the SharedPreferences method? In particular, as it seems to me that this method can work great with large amounts of data (larger than the available internal storage size). But what about small amounts of data? Thanks. A: SharedPreferences are designed to persist small amounts of data, so you shouldn't worry about how much data they can store. I have not used large amounts (in the tens of kilobytes), but I've read of others that have used it successfully. From the documentation... As large an amount of data as is needed. This will make sure that you do not exceed the overall quota for the application. Key names should not be unique per application, so you can have a shared-preferences-Key-name library and keep your activity's with their own key names. I do not have any experience in dealing with 10k byte files, but I'm sure there are techniques to get an in-memory cache or read the data directly from the files. Q: Python: format strings without the dots I have a string of words, and I need to check if it contains some prefix, or not. But I don't want to check every word in the string, I want to use a regex, because I have a large text, containing about 10k words, and I don't want to search each one separately. So, this is my pattern: ^[a-zA-Z0-9]+[.\p{L}\p{M}\p{S}\p{Z}]*$ I want to check if there is a group of three a-z chars, or not. And I want to do this in the pythonic way, as possible. The problem is that the dot is
