To establish a baseline investigation of Schirmer lacrimal gland (SLG) pathology in Sprague-Dawley rats, New Zealand white rabbits, and hairless albino guinea pigs. Retrospective case study. Sprague-Dawley rats, New Zealand white rabbits, and hairless albino guinea pigs kept at the University of Bristol, UK. A total of 318 Sprague-Dawley rats, 49 New Zealand white rabbits, and 15 hairless albino guinea pigs were included. SLG biopsies were obtained as part of a surveillance programme. Pathology of SLG was recorded as a categorical finding on a standardised form. The presence or absence of background atrophy or degeneration of glandular tissue within the biopsy was recorded. A range of SLG pathology was observed, including atrophy (142 of 318, 45%), degeneration (81 of 318, 26%), and changes in blood vessels (51 of 318, 16%). SLG changes were significantly more likely to be observed in hairless albino guinea pigs compared to those found in New Zealand white rabbits ($P < 0.001$, F-test) and Sprague-Dawley rats ($P < 0.001$, F-test). A further comparison of the absolute
